Emera reports earnings in $CAD, but the above table displays earnings in $USD per share. The following is based on results in USD; thus, results can be made more volatile due to currency fluctuations. Emera's earnings per share have been choppy in the last decade, with a floor in the 2016 and 2017 years, when the share count began to balloon. As a result, EMRAF has been able to grow earnings by 9.9% on average over the last nine years. Moving forward, we estimate Emera can grow earnings at a rate of 5.0% per annum.

The corporation will manage to grow its earnings primarily through rate increases, which the company expects to be in the range of 7.0% to 8.0% through 2024. Emera has a large capital program with expected spending of $6.6 billion USD to $7.4 billion through 2024. Over 60% of this capital program is related to decarbonization and reliability projects. Leadership expects the company's EPS and cash flow growth to track rate base growth over the long term. This EPS growth, in turn, is anticipated to lead to about 4% growth in the dividend through to 2024. This, following a 6% dividend CAGR since 2000 in constant currency.

Valuation Analysis

Year	2012	2013	2014	2015	2016	2017	2018	2019	2020	2021	Now	2027
P/AFFO	19.3	20.9	12.9	16.9	35.9	36.8	14.5	18.5	13.8	28.9	20.5	18.5
Avg. Yld.	4.0%	4.1%	4.1%	3.6%	4.2%	4.7%	5.2%	4.6%	4.8%	4.0%	4.3%	4.5%

The stock has traded at an average multiple of 21.8 and 22.5 over the last nine and five years, respectively. Based on forecasted 2022 earnings, EMRAF trades at a P/E ratio of 20.5. We believe the current valuation to be slightly overvalued and assign a fair value of 18.5 times earnings. If this valuation were to unwind, we could see losses of 2.1% per year as a result.

Safety, Quality, Competitive Advantage, & Recession Resiliency

Year	2012	2013	2014	2015	2016	2017	2018	2019	2020	2021	2022	2027
Payout	77%	86%	52%	62%	152%	172%	75%	86%	66%	130%	88%	84%

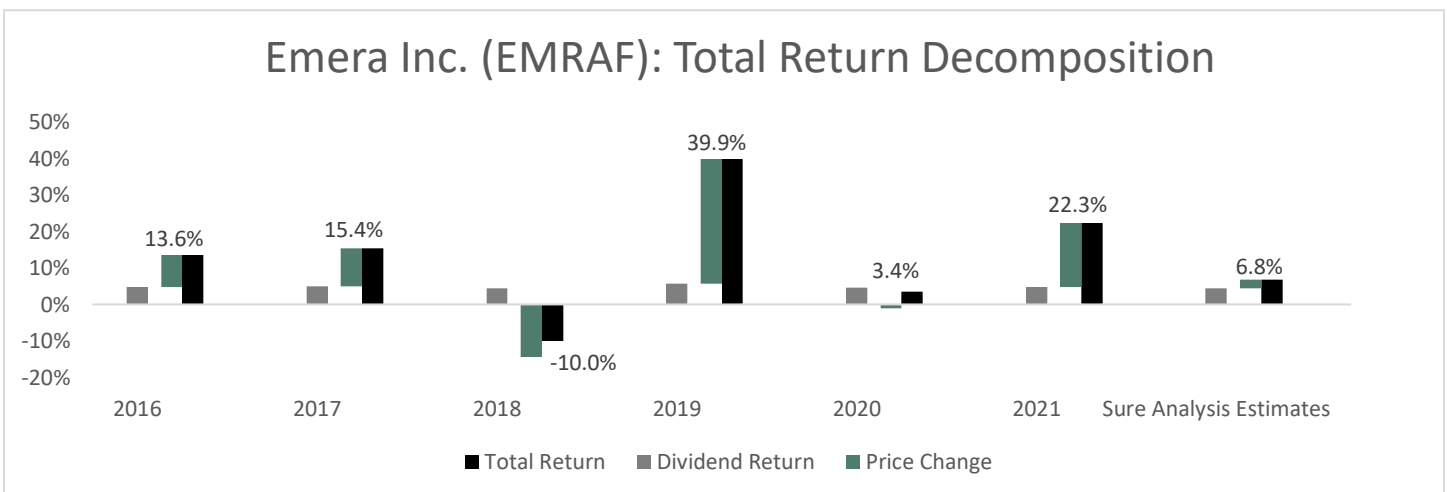

The company's dividend payout ratio has not been trouble-free, as it eclipsed the 100% mark in 2016, 2017 and 2021. Despite this, Emera has grown the dividend in $CAD terms for the last fifteen consecutive years. The company continues to guide for mid-single digit dividend growth.

Emera emerged through the Great Recession unscathed, as its electric utility business is an essential service provided to customers in all economic times. In fact, it was during this recession that the corporation resumed increasing its annual dividend after some years-long pause. The company does not possess any strong competitive advantage in comparison to its regulated electric utility peers.

Final Thoughts & Recommendation

Emera is a Canadian based electric utility company which has paid a dividend every year since 1993 and has raised the dividend in the last fifteen consecutive years. The corporation has a healthy dividend history, but the payout ratio is forecasted to remain in the high range. The company will grow primarily through executing on its multi-billion dollar capital program and rate increases. Over the next five years, we forecast annualized total returns of 6.8% for the stock, coming from a current yield of 4.3%, a growth rate of 5.0%, and a valuation contraction of -2.1%. We rate the stock as a hold at the current price as there is a fair expectation for growth and yield, despite trading 1% above our estimate of fair value.
